Abstract

This is a case study of how the Hong Kong cage dwellers operate as strategic actors in configuring their living path and in articulating their everyday existence. Based on the author's participant observation in a cage apartment from 1994 to 1995, this thesis provides a thick description of the setting and living in this cage apartment. Using Oscar Lewis' notion of "subculture of poverty" and the conceptual tools established in contemporary cultural studies, the author seeks to identify the ways in which the cage dwellers manage to organize their livelihood, and make their everyday life viable and meaningful. It is expected that detailed description of the deeds and deconstruction of the words of the cage dwellers would challenge prevailing stereotyping and stigmatization -- which are superimposed by the dominant discourse -- on the cage dwellers in particular and on all the subaltern groups in general.
