ABSTRACT

This study discusses how Chinese young women relate their reading women’s magazines to their self-representation and their self-construction of a feminine identity. The question is explored from two related perspectives: femininity as represented by the major international women’s magazine titles China and Chinese young women’s interpretation of those magazines.

The study first examines the construction of femininity encoding in ten major titles of international women’s magazines in mainland China through a quantitative content analysis of their covers and qualitative semiotic analysis, including both western-style and Japanese-style women’s’ magazines. Generally speaking, international women’s magazines provide an ordinary yet feminine femininity through their covers. All of them put great emphasis on fashion, providing resources for the external construction of femininity. The western style magazines also provide content related to the internal construction of femininity through resources. These are seldom mentioned in the Japanese style ones.

Examined through themes of body, fashion and feminism, the study reveals that in general, western style magazines present a more mature and sophisticated version of femininity. They represent a picture of women who are more confident with their body, and who adopt diverse strategies for managing their appearance. These women are endowed with a “can-do” nature and the ability to make decisions and take action independently. Women in Japanese style magazines, in contrast, are represented in a manner that is more childlike, innocent, and obedient.
This study further provides an alternative way to categorize international women’s magazines in China with regard to the femininity they presented to reveal individual differences among the major titles.

The interpretation from the readers is collected through in-depth interviews with Chinese young women. In general there are two types of users. One type of users has acute awareness of the existence of the external resources for femininity construction in whatever form. These users were willing and able to identify, mobilize, and utilize those resources for their femininity construction. The second type of users displays no interest in women’s magazines or alternative resources, and depends on their connections with information collectors to acquire the resources they needed for femininity construction.

However, most of the interviewees reveal a strong tendency to maintain a strong consistency in their self-presentation and self-identity as women, which is the identity-based decoding proposed in this study. The ideal of femininity defined by the interviewees concentrates on the internal qualities, such as individuality, competitiveness and activeness. Although they do indeed pay attention to the content of women’s magazines related to such issues in order to locate resources for their self-presentation, the external feminine traits deployed by the magazines, are considered as non-essential and rejected as markers of their own femininity by most of the interviewees. The version of Chinese femininity reflected in this study, briefly speaking, is the de-feminization on the external level, and internalization of “can-do” and “doing” on the internal level.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

DECLARATION ............................................................................................................................... i
ABSTRACT ..................................................................................................................................... ii
ACKNOWLEDGEMENT ............................................................................................................... iv
LIST OF TABLES .......................................................................................................................... vii
LIST OF FIGURES ....................................................................................................................... viii

CHAPTER 1 INTRODUCTION ...................................................................................................... 1
  1.1 Gender, Femininity, and Media ................................................................. 1
  1.2 International Women’s Magazines and Women Readers ................................ 4
  1.3 The Construction of Femininity in China ................................................. 11

CHAPTER 2 LITERATURE REVIEW ......................................................................................... 15
  2.1 Women and Media .............................................................................................. 15
    2.1.1 Sex, Gender, Femininity ............................................................................. 16
    2.1.2 Women in the Symbolic World ................................................................. 22
    2.1.3 Can Women Negotiate? ............................................................................ 27
  2.2 Audience Power and Media Power ............................................................... 34
    2.2.1 Women as Active Audiences ................................................................. 34
    2.2.2 Encoding-Decoding: From the Collective Level to the Individual Level ...... 38
    2.2.3 Construction of Femininity on the Individual Level ............................... 45
  2.3 Summary .................................................................................................................... 52

CHAPTER 3 WOMEN’S MAGAZINES IN CHINA .................................................................... 56
  3.1 Feminism and the Construction of Femininity in China .................................. 56
    3.1.1 Feminism and the Construction of Femininity: From the 1900s to the 1930s 57
    3.1.2 Feminism and the Construction of Femininity: After 1949 ...................... 61
  3.2 International Women’s Magazines in China .................................................. 66
  3.3 Study of International Women’s Magazines in China ..................................... 70
  3.4 Summary .................................................................................................................... 75

CHAPTER 4 METHODOLOGY ................................................................................................... 77
  4.1 Qualitative-Quantitative Inquiry in Everyday Life ......................................... 77
  4.2 Textual Analysis ......................................................................................................... 80
    4.2.1 Quantitative Content Analysis ................................................................. 80
    4.2.2 Semiological Analysis .............................................................................. 85
  4.3 In-Depth Interviews ......................................................................................... 88
  4.4 Limitations and Reflections on the Methodology .......................................... 93

CHAPTER 5 FEMININITY CONSTRUCTED THROUGH INTERNATIONAL WOMEN’S MAGAZINES IN CHINA .............................................................................................................. 95
  5.1 Overview of International Women’s Magazines in China ............................... 95
    5.1.1 What are in These Magazines? ................................................................. 96
    5.1.2 How Do Cover Models Look on the Magazine Covers? .......................... 98
    5.1.3 What is the Whole Picture? ..................................................................... 100
  5.2 Categorization Based on Origin: Japanese-style and Western-style ............. 104
    5.2.1 Body ......................................................................................................... 105
    5.2.2 Fashion .................................................................................................... 114
5.2.3 Internal Construction of Femininity and Feminism ........................................... 125
5.3 Chinese Elements in International Women’s Magazines ....................................... 138
5.4 Summary: Re-categorization of International Women’s Magazines in China ......... 141

CHAPTER 6 CONSTRUCTION OF FEMININITY: MAKING USE OF INTERNATIONAL
WOMEN’S MAGAZINES ........................................................................................................... 148
6.1 General Media Use Pattern ...................................................................................... 148
   6.1.1 Choice of Magazines among Active Users ...................................................... 150
   6.1.2 Making Use of Women’s Magazines ................................................................. 154
6.2 Passive Users and Non-Users .................................................................................. 161
6.3 Summary .................................................................................................................. 169

CHAPTER 7 CONSTRUCTION OF FEMININITY: SELF-PRESENTATION AND SELF-IDENTITY ......................................................................................................................... 172
7.1 From Self-Presentation to Self-Identity ...................................................................... 172
   7.1.1 Body, Fashion, and Ideal Feminine Traits ....................................................... 172
   7.1.2 Fashion and Self-Presentation ....................................................................... 180
   7.1.3 Consuming Fashion ....................................................................................... 192
7.2 Being a Woman: Self-Identity as Women ................................................................. 198
   7.2.1 An Ideal Woman in the Making ..................................................................... 199
   7.2.2 Family and Work: Looking to Achieve the Balance ....................................... 203
7.3 Summary .................................................................................................................. 213

CHAPTER 8 CONCLUSION ...................................................................................................... 217
8.1 Women as Active Audiences and the Media’s Role in the Construction of Femininity ................................................................................................................... 217
8.2 Feminine, Feminism, and Femininity: Re-Contextualized in China ......................... 223
8.3 Femininity Constructed by Chinese Young Women ................................................ 229
8.4 Limitations and Reflections ....................................................................................... 239
REFERENCES ............................................................................................................................. 242
APPENDIX .................................................................................................................................. 261
APPENDIX 1 .............................................................................................................................. 261
APPENDIX 2 .............................................................................................................................. 269
CURRICULUM VITAE ............................................................................................................... 271