ABSTRACT

Terror in the African Anglophone novels of Chinua Achebe, Doris Lessing, J.M. Coetzee and Laila Lalami originated as a consequence of a breakdown in the family structure. Traditionally, conventional patriarchy, in addition to securing the psychological and material needs of the family, has served as one of the building blocks of tribes and nations. Since the father figure within narrative is allegorized as a metonym of the state, the absence of patriarchal authority represents the disintegration of the link between individuals and national institutions. Consequently, characters may also turn to committing acts of terror as a rejection of the dominant national ideology. This dissertation aims to demonstrate how the breakdown of the family and the conventional gendering of roles may give rise to terrorist violence in the African setting.

To recontextualize the persistence of the Conradian definition of terror as an Anglo-European phenomenon brought to Africa, I contrast the ways in which the breakdown of the family affects both indigenous and Anglo-European households in Africa across generations. I suggest that, under the reinvention of older gender norms, the unfulfilling Anglo-European patriarchy exposes Anglo-European women to indigenous violence. Moreover, I theorize that the absence of patriarchal authority leads indigenous families to seek substitutions in the form of alternative family institutions, such as religious and political organizations, that conflict with the national ideology. Furthermore, against the backdrop of globalized capitalism, commodity fetishism emerges as a substitute to compensate for the absent father figure. Therefore, this project demonstrates the indisputable relationship between the breakdown of the family structure and individual acts of terror that aim at the fulfillment of capitalist fetish or individual desire, and at the expense of national security. Finally, the rhetorical dimension of terror against family and women in Africa will be proven to be the allegorized norm of globalized terror in the twenty-first century.
I would like to express my deepest gratitude to my supervisor, Professor Christie, whose inspirational guidance, constructive criticism and unfailing support, from the brainstorming stage to the final revisions, enriched my intellectual horizons and sharpened my critical thinking skills by requiring me to develop a deeper understanding on the subject.

It is a great honor for me to be a postgraduate student of HKBU. I have benefited greatly from the University’s excellent learning atmosphere, illuminating academic seminars and exciting campus life. My special thanks go to all of the academic and administrative staff of the Department of English Language and Literature for offering invaluable assistance to me throughout my writing process.

Lastly, I am grateful for God’s provision of challenges in life and of true strength to overcome challenging times.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

Declaration i
Abstract ii
Acknowledgements iv
Table of Contents v
List of Abbreviations vii

INTRODUCTION 1

Conradian Terror and its Legacy 7
Terror in African Anglophone Novels: An Overview 12
The Interplay of Family, Violence and Gender 19
Chapter Synopses 35

CHAPTER I

The Breakdown of the Family: Ritualizing Violence in Chinua Achebe’s Things Fall Apart and J.M. Coetzee’s Disgrace 42

The Role of the Family in Pre-colonial Culture 50
From Tradition to Modernity 64
Post-colonial South African Identity 73
The Return of Violence in Rural South Africa 84

CHAPTER II

The White Mistress: Colonial Family Roles

in Doris Lessing’s The Grass is Singing and J.M. Coetzee’s In the Heart of the Country 98
The Reinvention of Older Gender Norms 114
Women Masters in the Colonized South African Country Setting 122
The White Mistress and the Indigenous Servant 127
The Indigenous Father becoming Lover 148

CHAPTER III

Globalization of the Commodity: Allegories of Disillusionment

in Laila Lalami’s Hope and Other Dangerous Pursuits and Secret Son 161

The Erosion of the Husband in the Family 169
The Commodification of the Father under Globalized Capitalism 176
The “Dangerous Pursuits” of Alternative Family ISA 187
Narratives, Allegories and National Ideology 199

CONCLUSION 210

Globalized Allegories of Terror 212
Resisting Conradian Gendered Construction of Terror 219
Postscript: Terroristic Retribution as False Promise 225

Works Cited 227
Curriculum Vitae 235