ABSTRACT

This research aims to study the kind of communication behaviors that Hong Kong Cantonese speaking adolescents employ among their friends. The adolescents being studied were in the age range from 15 to 20 years old. They enjoyed the company of friends. Some friends they got along better with and some other they neglected.

This research analyzed, measured and compared how adolescents communicated with their friends at different levels of intimacy. Observed from their communication behaviors, communication styles were built.

Three boys and three girls were selected to be subjects. The researcher observed, interviewed and asked them definitions of friendship. Later, the researcher gave them each a recorder to record their conversations with their friends.

Communication behaviors drawn were based on conversation episodes extracted from cassette tapes that submitted by subjects. Communication behaviors of boys and girls with the same sex and cross sex were analyzed separately.

Results found that boys and girls show different combinations of communication behaviors in the same-sex and in the mixed-sex conversations.
